Restricted Key Systems

Larry is a skilled locksmith offering Restricted Key System service

Restricted key systems are generally set out as master key systems (see above), but not always. The defining feature of restricted key systems are keys which cannot be duplicated without proper authority.

Most of the time, master key systems are also restricted keys systems, but from time to time, master key systems are constructed with the use of simple domestic keys. The advantage of restricted keys over domestic keys are that they allow for a larger number of potential key combinations (allowing for the use of more keys within a system). Restricted keys also offer security enhancements over domestic or “standard” type keys.

One of the single greatest advantages of a restricted key system is that your keys cannot be duplicated without your permission. Other advantages include the commercial grade parts which are used in the preparation of locks when pairing them to suit restricted keys. The keys are also more hard-wearing, made from nickle silver. Finally, where domestic keys become worn over time as copies are made of copies, every restricted key issued is cut as an original (not duplicated).

MLAA (Master Locksmiths Association of Australia) restricted key systems, as offered by Larry, also offer the advantage of regimented membership guidelines which not only control expectations of restricted parts storage, but coherence of master key systems from key numbering through to key creation. Such properly managed restricted key systems can offer year upon year of reliable functionality.
